

A QUIET LONELINESS

TYPICALLY GERMAN FOR ME
On independence, beauty, and distance in everyday Germany.

In Germany, loneliness does not always hide indoors. It sits on benches, moves through vineyards, and lingers quietly in the city at night.

Surrounded by beauty, accompanied by silence.

Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany

Resting quietly, while the city continues to consume.

Köln, Germany

Public spaces connect places, not always people.

Esslingen am Neckar, Germany

Photographed in München and Konstanz, Germany

In beautiful landscapes and well-maintained public spaces, people often exist side by side without interaction. Everyone has their place, their path, and their silence. No one interrupts. No one asks why someone is alone.

As an international student, this quiet distance was one of the strongest cultural differences I noticed in Germany. Independence is deeply respected here — even when it turns into solitude.

For me, this is something typically German: a society where order, beauty, and personal freedom coexist with a calm, visible loneliness — not hidden, not dramatic, but quietly accepted as part of everyday life.